Letter from Massachusetts, 17, 24 October

[17 October] Dear Sir, I received your favor of the 24th ultimo enclosing the doings of the Convention at Philadelphia, directed to His Excellency the President of Congress [in?] three days after the date, which favor I should have highly prized had you not, at the same time, enjoined it upon me to make my objections to them (if any I had), and likewise that I would point out any alterations that may be made in our present Articles of Confederation which will better secure the natural rights, privileges, and liberties of human nature, and at the same time effectually support the authority and dignity of the states, and public faith. I now sit down to perform the first part you have enjoined upon me, but with great reluctance, for reasons I shall assign in my next, which I esteem the most arduous task you have assigned me, which you claim [as?] a debt due both to the public and yourself.

My objections to the doings of our Honorable Convention are many. You must excuse me if I do not mention one-half of them. I must be concise—shall mention only those which I conceive are CAPITAL, and would first observe generally: The form of government prescribed is too COMPLEX, couched in terms of many instances doubtful as though there was some art used to cover the full extent of the powers delegated, to be easily understood by all who ought to accept or reject the same; and that the form of government recommended most probably will be attended with greater expense than can be supported by an infant country exhausted of her wealth by the late war and impoverished by our own follies and luxuries since the peace, and the loss of our trade, the recovery of which there is not the least prospect, as restraints are laid upon it by all the powers in Europe, which however I took upon [as] a circumstance much in our favor, as it will gradually serve to disconnect us from the nations of Europe, for I have no desire we should import either foreign LUXURIES or foreign VICES.

A gradual decay of our trade must gradually increase our own manufacturers—which must increase industry, which will have a powerful influence to reform our morals. Nothing will promote industry so powerfully as necessity, unless it is cramped by an arbitrary sovereign and despotic government. No man will work with that cheerfulness for his lord, as he will when he knows his earnings are his own, nor do I think this three-branched government will sit easily [on?] the minds of the people, whose peace and quiet must be consulted, or we shall have trouble. The populace or multitude (as they are now called in contempt), when we first opposed British tyranny were complimented by the patriots of that day in halls and under liberty poles as being the fountain and origin from whence all power was derived, will not [sit?] easy under any government where they are deprived of all power, or so fettered in the exercise of what little power is left in their hands as will do them but little service. The chief agents in this new form of government planned out by Convention assume the humble title of President, Senate, and Representatives, but really are vested with the powers of King, Lords, and Commons; and although the government seems to be elective, their stations will be secured as amply, I humbly conceive, as though they were made hereditary, as the rights of the electors appear to be so much fettered, as to leave but little power in the hands of the people. My particular objections are first to the third paragraph in section 2, Article 1, which is in the following words: “Representatives and direct taxes, shall be apportioned among the several states, which may be included in this union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined, by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons.” Was not this form of words thus uncouthly used to avoid using the word Negroes? It certainly looks as though the word Negroes was omitted from the design. It cannot be from any fear of offending that nation of Africans. Why must that man that has 500 slaves in our Southern States, where slaves are looked upon only as personal property, have 300 of them exempted from capitation, while an inhabitant of the Northern States, possessed of the same number of horned cattle, horses, and hogs, be obliged to pay for the whole number? They are all considered as chattels. But to proceed, “The number of representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each state shall have at least one representative: and until such enumeration shall be made, the state of New-Hampshire shall be permitted to chuse three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New-York six, New-Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North-Carolina five, South-Carolina five, and Georgia three.” My objections to this part of the paragraph are that the representation is by far too small to transact the business of so large an empire. Our state assemblies may be annihilated, having nothing to do of importance; the power of taxation being vested in Congress, all other business may be transacted in our town meetings. A large representation has ever been esteemed by the best Whigs in Great Britain the best barrier against bribery and corruption, and yet we find a British king, having the disposition of all places, civil and military, and an immense revenue, SQUEEZED out of the very mouths of his wretched subjects, is able to corrupt the Parliament, to vote him any supplies he demands, to support armies, to defend the prerogatives of his crown, and carry fire and sword by his fleets and armies, to desolate whole provinces in the Eastern World, to aggrandize himself, and satisfy the avarice of his tyrannical subjects.

No wonder our American ambassador, struck with the brilliancy of the British Court where everything around St. James’s wears the appearance of wealth, ease, and plenty, should imagine a three-branched legislature only can produce these effects and make the subjects happy, should write a book in favor of such a government and send it over for the illumination of this Western World. If this is the sole fruit of his embassy, America will not canonize him for a saint on account of his services, when they have experienced the consequences of such a kind of government as he has planned out. In order to have formed a right judgment, he should have looked into the ditches which serve for graves for many of the human race—under hedges which serve as dreary habitations for the living—into the cottages of the poor and miserable, and critically examine with how much parsimony the mechanics, the day laborers, cottagers, and villagers live in order to support their high-pampered lords, before he had wrote a book to persuade his country to pursue the same road to greatness, splendor, and glory, and have reflected in his own mind, whether he could wish to see that country which gave him birth reduced to the same situation. By this arrangement of representation it seems this large and extensive empire, which in half a century will probably be double in number to the inhabitants of Great Britain, will be governed by 68 Representatives, of which six of the Northern States will be represented by 27 ONLY, and the Southern States by 41. No marvel that three-fifths of the slaves are exempted from capitation in taxation.

The Commons of England, if my memory serves me, consists of 5 or 600 or upwards, yet the king of Great Britain, if we may believe their own writers, has it in his power by places and pensions to corrupt a majority of his Commons, that his ministers can carry any vote they think proper to propose to support the dignity of his crown and rapaciousness of his ministers.

Therefore, should Congress at any future period grow haughty, insolent, and oppressive, they will have it in their power by places and pensions, which they are amply enabled to establish by the sale of the western lands, which by this Constitution is wholly resigned into the hands of Congress, to be at their disposal, which will be sufficient to corrupt a house of representatives double in number to the Commons of Great Britain. I now would make my objection to section 4th which is in these words: “The times, places, and manner of holding election for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time alter or make such regulations, except as to the place of choosing senators.” The plain meaning and understanding of which I take to be this, that Congress gives liberty to the assemblies of each state to make such regulations respecting the time, place, and manner of choosing Senators and Representatives. But if they do not improve it to their liking, they can alter it at pleasure, except the place of choosing. This is a most liberal and extensive favor granted to the assemblies of these states, which Congress can again at any time at pleasure revoke; therefore it will be prudent to use that liberty, and choose such Senators as shall be acceptable to Congress, or they may expect pretty soon to have such rules prescribed them, as to the time and manner, as will better comport with the views and designs of Congress, when modeled according to their NEW PLAN—prescribed by Convention. Passing over many lesser matters, I proceed to section 7, which is in these words: “All bills for raising a revenue shall originate in the house of representatives; but the SENATE may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.” I would here only observe that the Commons of Great Britain will not suffer the House of Lords to make the least alteration in a money bill; however, the Crown has found means to corrupt a sufficient number of the Commons to draw forth the blood and treasure of the nation. I now proceed to section 8, in these words: “The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, and excises to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States.” And the second paragraph of the 3d section, Article 4th, contains these words: “The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations, respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States.” By the first recited paragraph, we vest Congress with full power to lay and collect, by their own authority, what taxes, duties, and excises they please; and by the second, we surrender into the hands of Congress all the western territory, of larger extent, I conceive, than the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland—the richness of the soil, let those who have seen it declare. But so concise, and so ample a conveyance of such an extent of territory, couched in such smooth and easy language I never before read. I was so struck with the elegance of the style, I never once thought of its being a conveyance of land until I had read it over three or four times.
Now I submit it to the good sense of the people of these states, whether it is prudent we should make so liberal and extensive a grant of power and property to any body of men in these United States, before they have ever informed the public the amount of the public debt, or what the annual expenses of the federal government is or will be. It is now almost five years since the peace; and Congress has employed thirteen commissioners, at 1500 dollars per annum, as I am informed, to settle the public accounts, and we know now no more what the national debt is than at the first moment of their appointment. Nor do we know any more what is the amount of the annual expenses of the federal government than we do of the empire of China. To grant therefore such an ample power of taxation, and the right of soil, to the amount of millions, upon the recommendation of this Honorable Convention, without either knowing the amount of the national debt or the annual expenses of government, would not argue, in my opinion, the highest degree of prudence.

[24 October] I also object to the 9th paragraph of section 8th, which is in these words: “To constitute tribunals, inferior to the Supreme Court.” We have, I humbly conceive, law tribunals erected already, which are sufficiently expensive to exhaust the wealth of our richest citizens, and humbly implore, Convention, Congress, and the assemblies of the states, not to constitute any more. The shortest, the cheapest, and the most expeditious method to obtain distributive justice, between man and man, is to be preferred in any state; and the sooner that matter is taken up, by the several legislatures of the states, to shorten law processes, the better, and unless speedily effected, we shall be speedily undone. My next objection is to the 12th paragraph of section 8th, in these words: “To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.” A great deal of mischief may be done in two years, with guns, swords, and bayonets, and armies when once raised, it hath sometimes been found difficult to disband. I should therefore not think it prudent for Congress ever to raise an army merely to subdue Wabash Indians or any one single tribe. Should there be a general combination of all the tribes, or the states be invaded by a foreign enemy, Congress by our present Articles of Confederation are vested with full powers to draw out the military force of the states, nor have the states failed hitherto of compliance in this regard; but to limit them to two years is an affront offered to the dignity of Congress, and appears as tho we were afraid to trust the military force of the states in their hands, when there is just occasion. I take that to be one principal part of the business of Congress, to conduct the military arrangements of all the states, when judged necessary for the general safety. My next objection is to the 15th paragraph, which is in these words: “Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.” This looks too much like Baron Stuben’s militia, by which a standing army was meant and intended; I would only observe, to take the military force of the states out of the hands of their respective governors is a manifest indignity offered to them, as they ever have had the sole and exclusive command of the militia of the respective states. I observe the expression used is: “To execute the laws of the union.” In fact it means, to convert the militia of the states into a standing army under the entire command and control of Congress; and I would only observe further, that government and those laws which require a standing army to enforce them ought not to be supported in any nation under Heaven. My next objection is to the first paragraph of section 9th, in these words: “The migration or importation of such persons as any other states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year of 1808. But a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation not exceeding ten dollars for each person.” Why this sentence should be couched in this blind mysterious form of words, unless again to avoid using the word Negroes, I must leave those that drew it to explain.

But should think we have no right to complain of the Algerines, who live on the coast of Africa, if they enslave the Americans whom they find sailing in those seas, if we will send our vessels across the Atlantic, of set design, to purchase, kidnap, and decoy the inhabitants of the more southern states of the globe.

That man that will give his vote to import Africans for the space of 21 years, to drag out a miserable life in slavery, will vote to enslave the Americans at the end of that period. The cry has been, enlarge the powers of Congress—enable them to regulate trade; but it seems this Convention will not permit Congress to prevent the importation of slaves for 21 years yet to come. The seeming care taken to cover the true intent and meaning of this and some other parts of the doings of that Convention will be sufficient reason, in my mind, not to vote for one single paragraph it contains.

I shall make one short remark more on the 8th paragraph of this section, viz.: “No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States.” Congress, in our Articles of Confederation, have used the same precaution; nevertheless, the officers of the army have incorporated themselves into a society known by the name of the CINCINNATI. The views of which society have been fully laid open by the Honorable AEDANUS BURKE of South Carolina, which will, if neglected, finally terminate in nobility. It was no doubt founded with those views, and if permitted to have their annual meetings in the manner they have begun, once in a year or oftener, it will be found they will not fail of the original design of their voluntary incorporation. Not being able to pay the grant made to officers and army, we now pay the annual interest of their grant, being in the whole £99,000, which must, till we are able to discharge the principal, be considered as a pension. The principal, I presume, never can be paid, but by the sale of the lands ceded to the states by treaty. Nor do they fail to put themselves in the most respectable light upon all public occasions; I see they convened at New Haven, at your public commencement, walked in procession with his excellency your governor, president, corporation, and tutors of your college, and the clergy of the state, and I observe were dubbed, the honorable society of the CINCINNATI.

Omitting many other, perhaps very exceptionable, I will just make one observation on the 7th Article which says: “The ratification of nine states shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution, between the states so ratifying the same,” I would just recommend it to the members of our honorable convention, to reconcile this 7th Article with the 13th Article of our Confederation, which says: “The articles of this Confederation shall be observed by every state, and the union be perpetual, nor shall any alteration at any time be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterward confirmed by the legislature of each state.” It appears as tho the Convention wholly over-looked the 13th Article of our Confederation. Another thing is obvious by this 7th Article. It seems as tho the nine Southern States had prepared their matters in such a manner that they are ready prepared to dismiss the four Northern States, if they do not think fit to adopt the doings of this Convention, and be ready organized to proceed without them, as tho it was what they expected or desired. The third paragraph in the second section has a passage of the same complexion, in these words: “Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states, which MAY be included within this union.” Thus I have only hinted at some of the doings of this Convention which I am able to understand; many other dark and mysterious parts of it, which are beyond my comprehension, I must leave to you and others to unfold. One thing more, however, is beyond me, which I must mention. The assemblies of the states, it seems, will not do to ratify or reject this new Constitution, but it must be done by a CONVENTION, chosen by the PEOPLE, under the recommendation of their legislatures. It is perhaps not so difficult to comprehend the meaning of this measure, as to explain it to the understanding of everyone. The other part you have assigned me, I shall attempt as soon as I can arrange my ideas properly. In the meantime, I am, etc., yours.

Letter from New York, 24, 31 October

[24 October] “I received your favor of the 24th ultimo enclosing the doings of the Convention at Philadelphia, directed to His Excellency the President of Congress in three days after the date, which favor I should have highly prized had you not, at the same time, enjoined it upon me to make my objections to them (if any I had), and likewise that I would point out any alterations that may be made in our present Articles of Confederation which will better secure the natural rights, privileges, and liberties of human nature, and at the same time effectually support the authority and dignity of the states, and public faith” (if it were in my power to do it).

“I now sit down” to comply with the first part of your requisition; the second part must defer to a future opportunity, being convinced that if it be in my power to devise a better form of government than that proposed by the Convention, it will require some time to consider of it, and what strikes me forcibly at this time is that if I succeed, it will entitle me to an infinite deal of merit. Popular applause, you know, is a jewel of inestimable value.

I have considered the Federal Constitution attentively and, to tell the truth, under the influence of a prepossession against it, I was determined to object to it, if I could possibly find any objectionable parts, because I am in the horrors about losing my popularity and importance; and besides this, I had conceived the idea of framing a constitution myself, which I was convinced would do much better than anything the Convention could do. The Convention was composed of men who have high notions of grandeur, power, etc. These things you know are abominable in my mind; you have been long since acquainted with my extreme modesty in aspiring after places of honor, and accepting places of profit, even when they have been forced upon me. Notwithstanding all this, I am obliged to confess (which I do to you in confidence, for I would not wish such a confession should be publicly known) that the Federal Constitution contains a variety of peculiar excellencies. This declaration, I make with reluctance, for reasons which I shall assign in my next; you must excuse me if I do not mention one-half of them—I must be concise—shall mention only those which I conceive are capital, and would first observe generally the form of government prescribed appears to me to be so plain, simple, explicit, and easy to be understood, that none but idiots, the interested, and willfully blind can avoid seeing, understanding, and fully comprehending “the powers to be delegated” to the Congress of the United States. There does not appear to be in it any doubtful expression, any ambiguous terms, any double entendres. In fact, it does not appear to contain any snake in the grass. A child may easily understand it—may look at it, and handle it, without the least danger of being bit.

“The form of government recommended most probably will be attended with” less expense than any government in Europe—less than any other adequate form the states could devise, and much less than our present system of policy costs the people, and which can easily be supported, especially if the people are wise enough to retrench some of the unnecessary expense of the state governments, and prohibit the importation of “foreign luxuries and foreign vices,” which cannot be done, but by an energetic government capable of putting in execution prohibitory laws uniformly throughout the states.

A gradual increase of our manufactures will gradually diminish the necessity of importation, and a gradual diminution of importations will lay us under the necessity of manufacturing. The support therefore of our manufactures depends on a government capable of restraining importations. Necessity may do something, but extremely necessitous indeed must that country be which has nothing to export! If it hath anything to export, it may import whatever luxuries it pleases, unless there be a government capable of laying a restraint. Idle, therefore, and vain must be the whims of those who would risk the manufacturing interest of this country on the necessities of the people.

The people, I conceive, who “first opposed British tyranny,” and “were complimented by the patriots of that day in halls and under liberty poles as being the fountain and origin from whence all power was derived” will readily see that by the proposed Constitution they will lose no power, nor any right or privilege which they have ever held sacred and dear. There is not a single power granted to the Congress, by this Constitution, but what the people have ever granted to the assemblies of the states, and there is no privilege held by the people, with respect to the choice of their legislature and executive authority, but what is secured to them by this Constitution. The whole of the difference consists in this: part of the power granted by the people to the governor and assemblies of the states will be, by this Constitution, taken out of their hands and placed in the President of the United States and the Congress. The sole question, therefore, is which would answer the purposes of the people of the United States the best? No man can doubt here, nature and our own experience proves that without a national government, we can have no pretensions to the character or advantages of a national community. Without this, we are but a number of banditti, exposed to the craft and power of one another, and finally, will altogether fall a sacrifice to our own folly, and the power of foreign nations. So far therefore, I conceive, will the people consider themselves deprived of power, by the adoption of this Constitution, that they will acknowledge that it is the only plan in which they can delegate power with safety and to real advantage.
“The chief agents in this new-formed government, planned out by Convention,” do not “assume the humble title of President, Senate, and Representatives.” The Constitution plainly, openly, and without disguise tells us the titles, offices, powers, and privileges of these “chief agents,” and the purposes of their appointment. What snake in the grass is there here? The legislative and executive powers prescribed by this Constitution are clearly defined, judiciously limited, and constitutionally settled. What reason have we therefore to be jealous that the Constitution, under the disguise of such humble appellations, aims at the dignity and powers of the King, Lords, and Commons of the British Parliament? There is no more resemblance between this and the British government than there is between this and the government of the State of Connecticut. With equal propriety might the governor, upper and lower house of Assembly, be called King, Lords, and Commons, as the President, Senate, and Representatives in Congress. Such a whim could never have entered the noodle of any man of sense, unless it were for the purpose of frightening those who have been taught to start at the sound of “king.” It is with the same design that nurses tell children many strange stories about raw-head and bloody-bones. But this is not all. These “chief agents” are to become hereditary. Why not as well the governor, upper and lower house of Assembly become hereditary? People had better be on their guard against it. It is impossible to tell what men may do with power in their hands. Those who now have a seat in the upper house may take it in their heads that, under the humble title of assistant, they will in “effect” become lords, and devise some method of making such a dignity hereditary. People ought to be jealous—extremely jealous of their liberties.

But some particular parts of the Constitution I will take notice of being singularly excellent. And first, the third paragraph, section 2, Article 1. saith, that “representation and direct taxation, shall be apportioned among the several states, which may be included in this union, according to their respective numbers, &c.” It is manifest that representation and direct taxation ought to be proportioned among the people alike; it was an evidence of the wisdom of the Convention to establish (constitutionally) a rule of proportion between the states for their representation and direct taxation. These points ought to be put out of dispute. The only question is, whether the rule is a just one? To this it may be observed that the Convention consisted of the best-informed men from each state, and, as it is evident, it was a point which engaged their particular attention, we cannot doubt of its being as just a rule as could be established. There being three-fifths of the slaves in the Southern States, added to make an equality among the states, makes it evident that it was a rule adopted not at random, but on mature deliberation and the clearest evidence of its justice. Had the Convention, in the establishment of this rule of proportion between the states, added three-fifths (not “two-fifths”) of the “horned cattle, horses, and hogs” to the number of free persons, I should have considered it singularly hard on the Northern States that the Convention had paid no attention to the subject, and that in the article of representation and direct taxation, they had paid more regard to beasts than men. But to proceed. “The number of representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand,” etc. The annihilation of our state assemblies I do not think will originate in the smallness of our representation in Congress, nor that bribery and corruption would be prevented merely on account of a larger representation. If bribery and corruption must necessarily take place in all kinds of government, except our state governments (which may be thought to be immaculate, by some members of these honorable bodies), this Constitution proposes certainly the lesser will by establishing a small representation, for it will cost about nine-tenths less to corrupt Congress than it does to corrupt a British House of Commons.

An overabundant representation is an evil which this country has long complained of. We have in these states between two and three thousand legislators; eight-seven-eighths of which might be conveniently spared as useless and burthensome on the public. It was with good reason therefore that the Convention fixed the representation to one in thirty thousand. Sixty-five (not “sixty-eight”) Representatives is in all conscience enough to represent the present number of inhabitants; as much wisdom, integrity, knowledge, and patriotism may be found in that number as in sixty thousand, and certainly they can proceed with greater dispatch. When the country increases to “double the number of Great Britain and Ireland,” representation will be increased accordingly and not confined to twenty-seven only for the Northern States and thirty-eight (not “forty-one”) for the Southern. This particular has not been noticed by everybody, probably on account of its being lost in the “elegance of the style.” I would recommend it to all such to “read it over three or four times,” perhaps they will discover that if the proportion of representation had been fixed as the proportion now stands in the states, neither building, town, nor city could have contained the representatives of such a number of people.

Another excellency which I observe in this Constitution is the organization of the Congress; this is founded on so good principles, on the experience of ages, and is so agreeable to all the states that no objection can be made to it unless it be by those who are predetermination to object to the whole system.

“I would now make” some observations on section 4th, “which is in these words: ‘The times, places and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives, shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof; but Congress may at any time alter, or make such regulations, except as to the place of choosing senators.‘” This clause appears to be extremely inoffensive in its nature and safe in its consequences. Let the time and manner of election be what they will, they can neither influence nor oblige the people to choose any other than such men as they please. The reason of this provisionary clause is obvious. In the State of Connecticut, should the several towns regulate the election of their representatives as they should think proper, they might proceed so essentially various as to create great perplexity and inconvenience; the legislature therefore claim the right of regulating the elections in every town. For the same reasons and upon the same principles does the Constitution grant to Congress the power of regulating the elections in the several states, if they should proceed so diversely as to create perplexities. Marvelous, indeed, must be the sagacity of him who discovers art, design, and despotic power wrapped up in this very harmless clause!

“Passing over many lesser matters, I proceed to section 7 which is in these words: ‘All bills for raising a revenue shall originate in the house of Representatives; but the Senate may propose, or concur with amendments, as on other bills.’ I would here only observe” that this proves that the framers of the Constitution were no servile imitators of the British theory of government, nor under the special influence of Mr. [John] Adams’s sentiments, for “the British House of Commons will not suffer the House of Lords to make the least alteration in a money bill.”
“I now proceed to section 8, in these words: ‘The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties and excises to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence, and general welfare of the United States.’ And the second paragraph of the 3d section, Article 4 contains these words: ‘The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, and other property belonging to the United States.’ By the first recited paragraph we vest Congress with those powers which, in reason and good policy, Congress always ought to have been invested with. By each of the states holding an absolute, independent sovereignty, the honor and credit of the United States is lost—their safety is endangered—their trade nearly annihilated—the resources of the country unapplied to public good purposes—their wealth squandered away, and in every way the people have been plagued, cheated, and bamboozled by the present system of policy. None but those, therefore, who fear losing the opportunity of fingering public money will lament a permanent, judicious union of the wealth of the nation. The body of the people must be convinced that the purse of the nation will be as safe in the hands of their Representatives in Congress, as of their representatives in the state assemblies. That Congress will lay heavier taxes, and use more despotic powers over the property of the people, than the assemblies have done, no rational man can believe. Direct taxation will be greatly lessened, because Congress can and will make use of such resources for the support of government as the states, divided as they are, never could do. “By the second,” Congress is enabled to manage the property the states have in the western lands for general benefit. Is this conveying away territory to foreign nations? Is this robbing the people of their property? Into whose hands could the people place the management of their property with so much propriety as into the hands of a government capable of securing and defending it—capable of increasing its value and disposing of it to the best advantage? Unreasonably jealous must that man be who suspects that the property of the United States will be applied by the Congress to the purposes of private emolument, or to the base purposes of bribery and corruption, any more than those who are jealous and suspicious of all men but themselves. What is the plain, simple language of such men to the people? Your liberties, privileges, and property will all be ruined if you grant power to anybody but to us. In our hands you are perfectly secure! Wonderful integrity and wisdom!

“Now I will submit to the good sense of the people of these states whether” in the present political situation of the country, the general interest and welfare of the states can be promoted? Whether a sufficient provision can be made for the national defense? Whether public justice can be administered? Whether private property is well secured? Or, whether the commerce of the states is not tending to a total annihilation and their manufactures withering in the blossom? Whether injustice and oppression does not openly appear in our land? Whether licentiousness, which advances nigh to a contempt of all order and subordination, and even to rebellion, does not dare to erect its demoniac head? Whether we are not falling a sacrifice to the artifice and ungenerous designs of one another? Whether our Union is anything more than nominal? And in short, whether we can much longer exist as a nation?

The Constitution of government proposed by the Convention I do not think will operate as a magical charm. I have no idea that it will, at its first establishment, drive every evil out of the country or conjure into it every kind of national benefit; but I believe that, by a wise administration under it, it will do all that a wise and good form of government can do. It will by degrees, and in due time, answer all the purposes expressed in the Preamble, viz.: “form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.” This is all we want by it, and all we have reason to expect from it, and so much as this it promises. To be so far influenced, therefore, by jealousies, by sinister motives, by partial advantages, by popular and ambitious views, by the intrigues of designing men, or by dogmatical opinions, as to refuse the giving of it a fair trial, “would not argue, in my opinion the highest degree of prudence” or wisdom.

[31 October] Before I proceed to any further particular remarks on the Constitution, I would observe that it was manifestly the opinion of a majority of the citizens of America that a national government, of energy and efficiency, ought to be established over the United States for the better security and promotion of the interests of the individual, as well as the confederated states. Upon this opinion, they did proceed to the election of delegates to meet in Philadelphia for the express purpose of forming a system of government that should be the best calculated to answer these purposes. This Convention consisted of men in whom the people could place as great a degree of confidence as in any body of men they could have selected (perhaps if I should say the greatest, I should not say amiss). The interest of every individual state, and of the United States, was better known and understood than it was possible it should be by any individual on the continent, and without doubt, every article, section, and paragraph of the Constitution was fully debated, investigated, and maturely considered before it was agreed on and adopted. These things being so, I would ask, whether if any objections are made to the whole, or any part thereof, they ought not to be clearly stated and fully proved to be exceptionable? This I think is necessary to be done, in order to do justice to ourselves as well as to the Constitution itself. My being fearful of losing some importance among my fellow citizens, or a sinecure, or because I am friendly to a licentious state of government, or because I am jealous that other men will abuse their trust, or that I am enamored with my own notions, I do not think is a sufficient reason for objections, or a proof that such objections are founded in truth. Now all the objections I have heard, or read, or that have arose in my own mind, appear to me to be specious—destitute of reason and argument, and to have originated in selfish motives. They are uniformly calculated to excite jealousies, and raise parties, in order to prevent its adoption, which is an event (I presume to say) not wished for from a zeal to promote the public good.

Objecting to detached parts of the Constitution is by no means a fair and just method of treatment. In this way, the divine Constitution and administration might be made to appear, in the view of many, very exceptionable. In the present case, the most important, if not the only, question to be determined is whether all the parts form such a system of government as will answer the purposes of the people. Objections also, which are made on account of a jealousy that the powers of government will be abused, are unreasonable and unwarrantable. We, like all other nations, are so circumstanced that we must place confidence somewhere. We must place the powers of government in the hands of some individuals; this is unavoidable, if we have a government; and is it reasonable that because there is a possibility of men’s abusing their trust, that we should resolve not to have any kind of government? Which, I presume to say, is the case at this time. We have much law but no government as a nation. Or is it reasonable that I should raise objections to this Constitution, because I may probably be overlooked in the elections? The wisdom of this country undoubtedly consists in establishing a government the best calculated to prevent abuses; and I believe if the Constitution in question was to be candidly examined and compared with the constitution of every other nation now existing, it would be found to contain many excellencies which others are deficient in. The powers granted are but sufficient to answer the purposes of a good government. I presume no one unnecessary power can be pointed out and proved. And these are as well guarded as it is possible for powers to be guarded constitutionally; if these powers should be abused, it will not be the fault of the Constitution.

But omitting many things which might be observed with great propriety, shall proceed to some remarks on some particular paragraphs of the Constitution.

“The 9th paragraph of section 8” empowers Congress “to constitute tribunals inferior to the supreme court.” There would have been an essential defect in the national system of government had it been destitute of judicial powers; for, notwithstanding the tribunals established by the authority of the states are adequate to the purposes of their respective governments, yet they are not, and, in the nature of things, cannot have jurisdiction in a variety of national questions and causes. This is a sufficient reason for such an establishment; and as the institution of inferior courts is founded on principles which are assented to as good, by the suffrages of the people for ages, no reasonable or sufficient objection can be made to this paragraph.

“The 12th paragraph of section 8” is in these words: “To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.” “Guns, swords, and bayonets” are indisputably necessary to the defense and safety of a nation, and when under the control and regulation of a wise and judicious government, a government capable of making a proper application of them, nobody need be afraid of there being “a great deal of mischief.” But by being in the hands of parties who are engaged in party disputes and under the control of passion and heated animosity, without a government of sufficient power to control and regulate their conduct (which is too much the case at present), everyone has reason to fear them. The military force of a nation ought to be under the government and control of a national government. This none will deny, and, in this particular, the powers of Congress were deficient; for altho, by the Articles of Confederation, Congress was enabled to raise and commission armies, yet had no power to provide for their support. This grant of power provides for this deficiency; but as a guard against the unnecessary exercise of this power and to prevent the establishment of a standing army in times of peace, it is added that no money shall be applied to the support of an army for a longer time than two years. All money bills must originate in the House of Representatives; we have therefore no reason to fear that money will be appropriated to the support of an army unless an army should be necessary. This part of the paragraph is so far from being exceptionable that it is a real excellency and a sufficient guard against the support of standing armies.
I would next remark: “the 15th paragraph which is in these words: ‘Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia, to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.’” These states, not to mention other nations, have ever made the military power their last resort for executing their laws; this is seldom ever applied to, but on some occasions it is indubitably necessary. The principle is therefore good and agreeable to the sense of the people ever since the settlement of the country. Placing such a power in the hands of Congress is the only matter of objection; but, if Congress is invested with power to make laws, the power of executing laws in the most ample and effectual manner ought to be lodged there also. Without this, there would have been an inconceivable absurdity in the Constitution. The construction, but on this particular part, is too absurd to bear a serious refutation. “In fact it means (it is said) to convert the militia of the states into a standing army, under the entire command and control of Congress.” But who are the militia? The militia comprehends all the male inhabitants from sixteen to sixty years of age; it includes the knowledge and strength of the nation. Against whom will they turn their swords? Against themselves!—to execute laws which are unconstitutional, unreasonable, and oppressive upon themselves! Absurdity itself could never have thought of raising an objection on this ground. The Constitution in this respect is certainly liberal. It puts the utmost degree of confidence in the people, and is fully correspondent to our ideas of government. It is a sufficient proof that despotism was not the aim of the Convention; had it have been, the execution of the laws of the Union (as a last resort) might have been placed in the hands of a standing army in the service and pay of Congress. In such a case, much might have been said. That when the Congress resort to the militia, which is the body of the people, for the support and execution of the laws of the Union, it is done in confidence that the laws are just and good, and worthy of the support of the people, otherwise Congress can have no reason to expect support from that quarter.

My next remark is on “the first paragraph of section 9th in these words: ‘The migration, or importation of such persons, as any other states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited, by Congress, prior to the year 1808,’” etc. This sentence is neither dark nor mysterious; the meaning and intention is obvious. The doctrine of slavery is unpopular in this country and contrary to the sentiments of the more sensible part of the people. Nevertheless, it being imported with the original settlers of the Southern States from Great Britain, and practiced on ever since, it cannot be got rid of at one stroke. The interests of the Southern States are immediately involved in it. Their system of business cannot be altered at once without ruin. In this circumstance, the Constitution does everything which a constitution could reasonably do. It provides for the interest of the Southern States, and, at the same time, manifests to the world that slavery is inconsistent with the views and sentiments of this country, which error will be reformed as soon as it can be done consistent with the interest of the people. This paragraph is founded on a good and sufficient reason, and will not warrant the illiberal inferences which have been drawn from it.

“I shall make one short remark on the 8th paragraph of this section, viz.: ‘That no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States.’” This is [gr]ounded on the strictest principles of republicanism and is agreeable to the general sentiments of the citizens of America. How it could enter into any man’s head that this was exceptionable because “the officers of the army had incorporated themselves into a society, known by the name of the Cincinnat,” I cannot conceive. If it was the original intention of the officers to obtain the dignity and rank of nobility, surely this Constitution is the only means by which such a design could be frustrated. Such a bugbear story may serve to alarm the fears of the credulous, ignorant, and jealous; for my own part, in the exercise of government established on this Constitution, I have no more apprehensions from that society than I have from the society of Freemasons. What will the one have to do with the government more than the other? Our present situation is favorable to such a design, and I cannot think of anything that will so effectually prevent its execution as a well-constituted government which prohibits every kind of royal honors.

“Omitting many other” excellent parts of this Constitution, “I will just make one observation on the 7th Article, which says: ‘The ratification of nine states shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution, between the states so ratifying the same,’” which I do not think by any means incompatible “with the 13th Article of our Confederation.” The will of a majority of the people hath always been considered by the people of this country as sufficient to determine and bind the minority; and upon this principle the article alluded to ought to be construed. It would be extremely absurd to suppose that nine states could not determine four, while four could determine and control nine, which would be the case if the ratification of every individual state was necessary to establish this Constitution, agreeable to the construction some have put on the 13th Article of the Confederation. The Convention, however, do not make it obligatory on four states, if so many [sh]ould refuse their assent. No hardship or compulsion can be complained of in this case. Every state may act entirely free.

The oblique hint lately given in public, that it [w]ould be advisable to separate the four Northern States from the rest, proves the author to be no real friend to the welfare of the country.

“One thing more” I will mention as an excellence of the resolves of the Convention, which is that it is recommended that a convention be chosen by each state for the purpose of examining its merits and to ratify or reject it. “The meaning of this measure” is easily comprehended and easily explained; there does not appear to be any hidden meaning in it nor dark design. The Convention was willing and desirous that it should be thoroughly examined and maturely considered by the sensible part of every state, and as it should by them be found, so to be treated. The impropriety, and indeed the impossibility of the Constitution’s being treated as a subject of this nature ought to be by the people at large or by town meetings, was notoriously manifest; the Convention therefore proposed the only method that could be thought of to have its merits or demerits fairly determined.

The remarks of some that this Constitution covers art and design—that it contains dark and hidden mysteries—that it is incomprehensible—and that the people will lose their liberties and establish a despotic government are as reasonable and calculated to produce the same effects on the minds of the people as that of an almanac maker, who, through wantonness, should predict that a comet would appear next year, whose fiery tail would approach so near the earth as to set it on fire. The credulous and ignorant would be frightened with the apprehension of approaching destruction, and the sensible and judicious would laugh at the visionary tale.

I have now given you my real sentiments on the Federal Convention. Whatever my secret wishes may be with respect to its fate, I confess I have not sagacity enough to find out anything materially exceptionable. Notwithstanding which, I already anticipate the pleasure I shall enjoy, on some one man’s “arranging his ideas so properly” as to prove incontestably, that the members of the Convention were a set of designing knaves and ignorant fools, and that it is within the compass of his abilities to form a constitution worth forty of that which is now proposed. “In the meantime, I am, etc., yours.”
