

CENTER FOR THE STUDY OF THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION

csac.history.wisc.edu > Document Collections > The Constitutional Convention > The Campaign Against the Critics of the Constitution > Alexander Hamilton Attacks New York Governor George Clinton

Pennsylvania Gazette, 8 August 1787

Some timid, or perhaps interested politicians have expressed apprehensions, that the new foederal government will not be adopted by the states, or the people. Such persons do not know, or recollect, the good sense of the Americans, who, under less pressing circumstances, in the year 1775 adopted the resolutions of Congress, and in the year 1776 the Declaration of Independence. For neither of these were the citizens of America half so well prepared, as they are now for a vigorous foederal government. It is probable some of the states will object to it, and certain factions, composed of salary and perquisite men, may object to it in all the states; but (as was the case with the resolutions of Congress and the Declaration of Independence) truth and the public safety will finally prevail over self-interest and faction, and America will be the delight of her friends and citizens, and the envy, admiration and example of the whole world.

CITE AS: John P. Kaminski et al., eds., The Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution, Vol. XIII: Commentaries on the Constitution, Public and Private [1] (Madison, Wis.: Wisconsin Historical Society Press, 1981), 138–39.