

CENTER FOR THE STUDY OF THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION

csac.history.wisc.edu > Document Collections > Religion and Ratification > Concerns About the Freedom of Religion

Zachariah Johnson Speech: Virginia Convention 25 June 1788 (excerpt)

. . . We are also told, that religion is not secured—that religious tests are not required.—You will find that the exclusion of tests, will strongly tend to establish religious freedom. If tests were required—and if the church of England or any other were established, I might be excluded from any office under the Government, because my conscience might not permit me to take the test required. The diversity of opinions and variety of sects in the United States, have justly been reckoned a great security with respect to religious liberty. The difficulty of establishing an uniformity of religion in this country is immense.—The extent of the country is very great. The multiplicity of sects is very great likewise.—The people are not to be disarmed of their weapons—They are left in full possession of them. The Government is administered by the Representatives of the people voluntarily and freely chosen. Under these circumstances, should any one attempt to establish their own system, in prejudice of the rest, they would be universally detested and opposed, and easily frustrated. This is a principle which secures religious liberty most firmly.—The Government will depend on the assistance of the people in the day of distress. This is the case in all Governments. It never was otherwise. . . .

CITE AS: John P. Kaminski et al., eds., The Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution, Vol. X: Virginia [3] (Madison, Wis.: Wisconsin Historical Society Press, 1993), 1531–32.